

AJP gets GOI support, Editorial Board nominations

The editorial board is delighted in sharing good news with the readers and contributors of the AJP. The Department of Science and Technology, Government of India, has awarded financial support to the AJP. Although this support comes more as recognition than as finance, the latter would certainly help boost the journal further. Because the deficit of the journal is likely to be met with the provided support, the board has decided to not increase the subscription rates for the year 2010, which was on the cards. We acknowledge the efforts of Mr. DK Sharma, the Ex-Associate Editor, the award coming after his having left us.

With this issue, the AJP is completing its third year of existence, although our editorial-advisory board remains more or less similar to that of the inaugural issue. I feel this requires radical changes, also because many members having served enough are now looking at retirement, while new ones are interesting in getting into editorial work. I solicit all the readers and contributors of AJP to e-mail us the nominations alongwith the nominee's resume of the contribution in the area.

Wishing you a Happy and Prosperous 2010.
